

Columbia University Quarterly, Vol. 12 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Columbia University Quarterly, Vol. 12 Not long ago a distinguished lawyer of the Middle West, pleading the cause of one of the societies for improving civic conditions, risked the assertion that the higher life of the American people had been drugged with a spirit of mercenary materialism, and that political self-seeking and unlimited corporate greed have become a national religion, while material aggrandizement is leading us in the direction of national decay. Although this charge is overdrawn and is likely to be thrown out by the grand jury of enlightened public opinion, there is conviction in his later statement that mere material prosperity is what is too commonly known as success in life, whereas in reality it is failure, for it confounds the end with the means, since we have reached only the portals of success when we have become wealthy and influential. Our culture is more or less shallow, and our lives are more or less limited and crippled, unless we are patriotic and unselfish. We are like plants which put forth the buds of promise but never reach the blossoming stage. It may be admitted, at once, that in the mouth of the ordinary American of today the word success is usually interpreted to mean material prosperity, the attainment of a comfortable fortune, the acquisition of the assured position which money generally gives.
